

Engagement

Sequestration

The Social Totality

There is a footnote in a well-known essay on sincerity that briefly mentions the moment when the citizenry of seventeenth-century England seemed to develop a distaste for owning (and probably sitting on) benches. This led naturally to an increased demand for single-occupant seating among those who possessed the means to indulge their escalating fondness for personal space

Within this same footnote it was observed that this shift happened to coincide with an increased tendency amongst individuals leading rather unspectacular lives to keep self-reflective written diaries

My Space

Your Space

Commonality

Self-Reflection

